

“What Youth Soccer Has Meant To Me.”

Eiman Faramarzalian

I love playing soccer! Because of soccer, I have picked up many of the personal qualities that I have today. For instance, soccer has helped me build self-confidence. In soccer you must be confident with the ball and trust yourself to make the right decisions when playing; this also comes into play in real life. Without a certain degree of belief in your capabilities, it's hard to succeed in life. Soccer has also taught me the value of trust and teamwork as it's vital that you and your teammates work together and have faith and trust in each other, for one person can't do everything on his own. In everyday life you must also have love and trust in others, for without them life becomes very difficult. In order to reach your highest aspirations it is crucial to have somebody you can depend on, such as a teammate or a partner. As the captain of my soccer team, I have learned many leadership skills that I have shown advantageous to me in high school. One of the most important abilities I have gained from soccer is the ability to form lasting friendships. When you play with certain teammates for a long period of time, you form strong bonds of friendship that can't easily be broken. The trust and love you learn to have in each other becomes priceless. I will always continue to play soccer, and to whatever college I choose to attend, I hope to become a helpful addition to the varsity soccer program. I love playing soccer!
